It is also important to note that the results of this study are based on a cross-sectional design, which means that the data were collected at a single point in time. This limits the ability to establish causality between the variables studied. Future research should consider longitudinal designs to better understand the temporal relationships between these factors and the outcomes of interest.

There is a growing body of evidence that the use of the word "rape" is often avoided in legal proceedings, and that the use of the word "sexual assault" is often preferred. This is because the word "rape" is often associated with a specific act of sexual violence, while the word "sexual assault" is a broader term that encompasses a wider range of sexual offenses. This can lead to confusion and misunderstanding, and it can also make it more difficult for victims to seek justice. The use of the word "sexual assault" is often preferred in legal proceedings because it is a more neutral and less emotionally charged term. However, it is important to note that the use of the word "sexual assault" does not necessarily mean that the act was less serious or less violent than the act of rape.
